The following interview with Cecily Mistarz, Integration Management Office Director, was posted on the BMO/Harris intranet as an update regarding the integration of Harris and M&I.

Combining the Best of Both Banks

@Work caught up with Cecily Mistarz, Integration Management Office Director, in Chicago, to talk about the Harris and Marshall & Ilsley integration.

What is the status of the integration work?

We recently achieved significant milestones with the announcement of a new bank name, leaders, and business model that will unify us, post-close, as one North American company 45,000 strong. There is great energy around combining the best of both banks in a way that positions BMO Harris Bank to realize the transformational opportunities of this acquisition for customers and employees.

What's next?

Regulatory approvals and getting BMO Harris Bank to market. Integration teams are drilling down to the complex future-state blueprint work. That means defining organizational alignment across all lines of business to get us to market and, post-close, implementing our plans for customer and employee experience. We are committed to a transition experience for all employees that is engaging, respectful and provides for uninterrupted productivity for customers. To stay true to the BMO culture, customers must remain at the center of everything we do, at every stage of integration and conversion.

How is the IMO driving employee engagement?

We can't succeed without it. We are working through the Employee Experience group to ensure employees of BMO Harris Bank feel informed, connected, and committed to customers and their futures.

To make that happen, the group has begun Pulse Survey Work, conducting one-on-one interviews with leaders at Harris and M&I. They also are convening discussion sessions with customer-facing and corporate support employees from a cross-section of businesses. This survey work will continue post-close and throughout the conversion phase, to ensure a direct line of communication from the field.

It is our goal that employees have the information and the tools and training they need to deliver a great customer experience.

What happens on day one?

We will be BMO Harris Bank. For customers it will be business-as-usual, at their branches, online and on the phone, as we work toward closing and begin the work of integrating the two banks. Following the close of the acquisition, our legal name will change on some documents and some of the signs posted at the branches. We are committed to delivering a seamless transition for our customers, which includes keeping them informed throughout the process.

For employees, we will be focused on keeping you informed and building the culture of one North American company, 45,000 strong, across our expanded U.S. footprint

How are we going to communicate with each other after day one?

We've worked very aggressively to make sure that the BMO Harris intranet site will be available to all BMO Harris Bank employees on day one. That will be the central location for all of us to access the same enterprise news, communication updates, HR information and integration updates. Our intranet site also houses our internal phone directories, which will contain contact information (phone, email, location) for all of us on day one.

What kind of communication can we expect next?

In the coming weeks, our M&I colleagues will receive more information on benefits, policies, and payroll. Additionally, we will be providing customers with advance notice of the Change in Terms (CIT) to their deposit agreements and the change of Harris N.A.'s name to BMO Harris Bank N.A.
